The fruits are about 4 cm long, round with a pointed tip and four or six sepals. When ripe it is yellow and contains a sweet, green edible pulp enclosing two or three stones. The tree grows wild in Ethiopia, and in ancient times it grew all over Egypt. Fruits have been found in burials of the Old Kingdom and later, leaves have been identified in mummy garlands from the New Kingdom, where they formed the basis for the setting of other floral elements... Two large bouquets were found in the tomb of Tutankhamun. In the medical texts it ocfurs just once in a remedy for 'white spots', an ointment consisting of red ochre, kohl, boiled persea pulp, and another plant ingredient, pounded in sycamore juice... The word is'd is generally taken to designate the persea tree and its fruit...' (Lise Manniche, An Ancient Egyptian Herbal, British Museum Publications Ltd., pp. 121-122)}.

Amomum cardomum or elettaria cardamomum. cardamom seed; kardamomen (Ger.); cardamomes (French). "Cardamom is mentioned in the ancient Sanskrit writings of Sus'ruta. It is listed as an Indian spice in the customs liable to duty in Alexandria, AD 176-180 and first described as a product of the Malabar coast by the Portuguese navigator Barbosa in 1563. The species first used as a spice was probably the amomum cardomum of Siam and Java, which is thought to represent amomon of Dioscorides and amomi uva of Pliny... Habitat: Indo-china, in mountainous districts. Cultivated in Ceylon and near the Malabar coast of India, and recently in Guatemala... In Mysore the plants are grown in the betel-nut plantations between the palms... The drug is exported both in the fruit (capsules) and seed form in chests... The 'Allepey greens' are claimed to be the best cardamoms for use in distilling the volatile oil... Bengal cardamom, from amomum aromaticum has 9 wings near the summit of the capsule. Its seeds are about 3 mm. long and possess an aromatic, camphoraceous taste... Uses: carminative, aromatic, condiment, and flavouring agent in curries, various food products.. cardamom oil is used in perfumery. (Heber W. Youngken, Textbook of Pharmacognosy, Philadelphia, The Blakiston Co., 1950, pp. 231-236).

6030.Bride-price; written order: muhri a horse, cow, buffalo or camel, given in dowry by a bride's father (P.lex.) mokh price; present; the price paid for an amulet. Sayads, incumbents of shrines, faqirs, kutanas, sell scraps of paper with some words written on them, generally the name of God, which the buyers hang round their own necks or the necks of children or cattle to protect them from evil spirits and the evil eye. The price is always exacted before the amulet is given. A very efficient amulet can be bought for five pice, but sometimes as much as one rupee is given (P.lex.) Synonym: phull an amulet, a charm. The belief in the power of amulets is universal. Those who give, or rather sell, amulets are, firstly, sayad and kureshis who are considered more pleasing to God than others; secondly, the incumbents of shrines and their sons; thirdly, impostors who persuade people of the efficacy of their amulets... The price paid is called mokh, and whenever the desired result is attained, another amulet is made in addition to the one previously obtained (P.lex.) makar < mahr (Arabic) written contract making a settlement on a wife; a marriage portion or gift, settled upon one's bride; dowry, jointure, alimony; amount paid or promised to a bride by the bridegroom as security for his keeping the marriage tie (Ta.lex.) makaram decorative designs about the dais built for seating the bride and bridegroom at the time of marriage (Ta.lex.) Alimony: mahir money which amongst Muhammadans a man at his marriage engages to pay his wife in case of divorcing her, jointure, alimony; mahirkhai a thief catcher; a reward given to one who catches a thief (P.lex.) The phrase is best taken as one, viz. 'the nobles, royal kings'. It may be a term for 'vice-kings' or substitute-kings, or those who are successors of the king. Sutta-nipa_ta Anguttara 453 takes the three words as three different terms and places bhoja_ = bhogiya_ as designation of a class or rank (= bhogga). Neumann in his translation of Sutta-nipa_ta has 'konigstamme, kuhn and stolz', free but according to the sense. The phrase may in bhoja contain a local designation of the Bhoja princes (name of a tribe), which was then taken as a special name for 'king'. The cork of commerce is obtained from the bark of quercus suber and quercus occidentalis... Nutgall: synonyms: galls, aleppo galls, smyrna galls; Turkey or Syrian galls; gallapfel (Ger.); galla d'alep (Fr.); botanical origin: quercus infectoria; part used: the excrescence obtained from the young twigs; habitat: Mediterranean basin from Greece to Persia; Production: the female of cynips tinctoria, gall-fly punctures the young leaf buds of the dyer's oak with her ovipositor and deposits one or more eggs in the wound. The egg hatches and a young insect or larva emerges in the plant tissue. The larva secretes a fluid (probably from its salivary glands) which contains an enzyme capable of converting starch into sugar. The cells immediately surrounding the larva contain considerable starch and are termed the nutritive zone. This starch is gradually changed to sugar by the enzyme which makes more food available than usual to the growing plant cells. The protoplasm of these is, accordingly, stimulated toward greater cell-reproduction as the rate of change from starch to sugar is accelerated, and a hypertrophied growth, tumor or gall is the result. In the gall the insect undergoes a metamorphosis, passing from the larva or 'worm' stage to the chrysalis or pupa stage and thence to the imago or adult stage. In this last stage it channels its way out leaving a tubular canal communicating with a central cavity. While the insect is in the early larval stage most of the cells of the gall contain numerous tiny starch grains. By the time the larva is transformed to a chrysalis, gallic acid has taken the place of starch in the cells near the middle of the gall, while tannic acid in masses is abundantly present in the cells at the center and near the outer margin. When the imago or adult winged insect is developed, most of the cells of the gall contain masses of tannin together with a small amount of gallic acid. After the imago has emerged from the gall, the tannin constituent of the cells undergoes oxidation which results in replacement by an insoluble product. The gall becomes lighter in weight and colour and more spongy in texture. The so-called 'white galls' of commerce represent this last stage. The galls should be collected before the insect has emerged. Most of the official galls are gathered by the peasants of Asia Minor, Syria and Persia who dry them in the sun... On account of different stages of maturity, the galls vary in colour from black, through green and blue, to white... Uses: astringent, chiefly in the form of the ointment. Nutgall is the chief source of tannic acid. Tannic acid has astringent and styptic properties and is a chemical antidote for poisoning by alkaloids... Chinese galls are produced on the leaves of rhus chinensis... (Heber W. Youngken, Textbook of Pharmacognosy, Philadelphia, The Blakiston Co., 1950, pp. 266-270).

Gamboge is a gum-resin obtained from garcinia hanburii (Fam. guttiferae), a tree indigenous to South-east Asia... The liquid is collected in the internode of a large bamboo. When sufficient liquid has been collected, it is poured into smaller bambooos in which it solidified in about a month. The bamboos are then heated until they crack and the gamboge is removed. Gamboge occurs in rolls 15-20 cm long and 3-6 cm in diameter or in cakes. The former variety, pipe gamboge, is preferred. The surface, which is brownish-orange in colour, is frequently covered with a greenish-yellow powder and bears longitudinal striations formed by contact with the fibres of the bamboo... Gamboge is a typical gum-resin, and when triturated with water, it forms a yellow-emulsion. Good gamboge contains 70-80 per cent ofresin (gambogic acid) and 15-20 per cent of water-soluble gum with which is associated oxidase enzyme. Gamboge is no longer used in human medicine but is sometimes given as a purgative to cows. It is also used as a pigment. (G.E. Trease and W.C. Evans, Pharmacognosy, 12th edn., London, Bailliere Tindall, 1983, pp. 470-471). Yellow resin: paccilai Mysore gamboge, garcinia xanthochyumus (Ta.); pacca_ri (Ka.)(Ta.lex.) Garcinia mangostana: Wehmer records that the rind contains 5.5 percent of tannin, and a resin... a yellow, crystalline, bitter principe, mangostin... Kirtikar and Basu, quote Rumpf, who states that the bark and young leaves are employed by the Macassars in diarrhoea, dysentery, and affections of the genito-urinary tracts, and also as a wash for aphthae of the mouth. ... that the rind is used as an astringent medicine for diarrhoea and dysentery... they say that the value of the rind lies in the yellow resin which it contains... which acts as a stimulant to the intestines... They quote Waitz, who recommends a decoction of the powdered rind as an external astringent application. (Medicinal Plants of the Philippines, p. 622).

Ficus indica: According to Nadkarni, the bark contains tannin, wax, and caoutchouc... Bruntz and Jaloux report that the latex is official in French pharmacopoeia; and the resinous substance, in the Belgian, Danish, French, Greek, Mexican, Rumanian, Swedish, and Venezuelan pharmacopoeias... In the Philippines the Negritos and Mangyans use the pounded and cleaned bark to cover their private parts... Nadkarni states that the bark is tonic and diuretic, and the fruit, cooling and tonic. The young buds and the milky juice are astringent. The milky juice is useful as an external application to pains and bruises and for rheumatism and lumbago. The leaves are heated and applied as a poultice to abscesses to promote suppuration and discharge of pus. Internally, it is useful in dysentery and diarrhoea... The concentrated juice in combination with the fruit is an aphrodisiac... Ainslie states in his Materia Indica that the latex is applied in toothache to the tooth or gums and also to the soles of the feet when cracked or inflamed. A solid mass of fat, presumably ox tallow, previously perfumed with herbs and spices, was shaped into a cone and fixed to the wig or placed on the crown of the head. During the festivities part of the part would inevitably soften or even melt and envelop the wig, clothes and body with its grease and scent. This custom may not seem very appetising to modern Western taste, but it nevertheless survived into the present century among certain Beduin tribes who inhabited deserts around Egypt. Dioscorides gives detailed instructions concerning the manufacture of scented fat... Acacia Farnesiana (cassie, huisache) Cassie perfume, distilled from the flowers, yields cassie absolute, to prepare violet bouquets, extensively used in European perfumery. Cassie pomades are made in India. Pods, containing 23% tannin, are used to tan leather. Bark is also used for tanning and dyeing leather in combination with iron ores and salts. A gummy substance obtained from pods is used as cement for broken pottery. Gum exuding from trunk is considered superior to gum arabic. These trees are used as ingredient in Ivory Coast for arrow poison; elsewhere they are used as fences and to check erosion. Wood is used for wooden ploughs and for pegs. Woody branches are used in India as toothbrushes. (James A. Duke, Handbook of Medicinal Herbs, Boca Raton, Florida, 1985, p.5). tumma babool tree, acacia arabica (Te.); tumba_ id. It is indigenous to India and is now grown in all the Mediterranean countries. It is an annual herb with a pungent aromatic flavour. It is widely used in cooking and is the predominant ingredient in pesto sauce... Basil oil rubbed on the temples eases headache. It has the reputation of being aphrodisiac and was formerly used to aid childbirth. Sprinkled on the floor it leaves an aromatic scent in a room, and a pot on the window sill keeps flies away. The dried and powdered leaf has been taken as snuff... The classical writers mention basil, the "royal" herb, as being used to flavour food and as decoration in floral garlands. Propero Alpini lists it as one of several ingredients in a remedy to avoid contracting the plague.' (Lise Manniche, An Ancient Egyptian Herbal, British Publications Ltd., p.128). The rectified oil, oleum terebinthinae rectificatum, is used very commonly inmedicine. Foreign turpentine is largely used in perfumery and in the manufacture of artificial camphor.' Indian turpentine available in the market is produced chiefly from pinus longifolia, one of the most important trees of India... The Indian turpentine, on account of absence (or insufficiency?) of pinene, cannot be employed in the camphor industry... Wood is aromatic, antiseptic, deodorant, stimulant, diaphoretic and refrigerant, rubefacient and carminative. (Indian Materia Medica, pp. 957-959). Pinus longifolia: sarala (Skt.); chir, saral (H.B.); the aromatic wood of pinus longifolia is used in Hindu medicine. The tree yields an oleo-resin called sarala drava, sriva_sa and kshira in Sanskrit. In the vernacular it is called gandhabiroza. Dr. Royle remarked, 'The chir exudes or yields to incisions a very fine turpentine. This is chiefly valued by the natives for its resin, and as the latter is only obtained by exposing the turpentine to heat, the oil, the more valuable roduct is dissipated to procure the resin; but by adopting a very simple still, the resin was obtained as good as ever for the purposes of the natives while the oil of turpentine which distilled over was pronounced on being sent to the General Hospital of Calcutta, to be of very superior quality.' Turpentine is now distilled by the natives in the Panjab but the distilled oil is not mentioned by Sanskrit writers... The ole-resin or crude turpentine is used in the preparation fo plasters, ointments and pastiles for fumigation. (Sanskrit Materia Medica, pp. 247-248). 'This term, vri_hi being without a perceivable root in Sanskrit is no doubt connected with the Dravidian akki (or arki; Ta. arici; Ma. ari; Tu. ari, akki) and Telugu vari. The syllable vri is the same as Telugu vari and syllable -hi has been formed of Kanarese and Tul.u -ki and Tamil -ci. In common Tamil the Sanskrit word vri_hi is written viriki; Tamil k often stands in the place of h.' (No. 126 Preface; Kittel's Ka. lex.) 'oryza... It is clearly a borrowed word and, as is recognised by Pott and Benfey, seems not so much directly to resemble the Sanskrit vrihi-s (m) in sound as to be an attempt at representing a related Persian form which has a sibilant instead of h... Pictet gives the Afghan urishi which also has a vowel in the place of v. The Greek by-form orynda comes nearer to Armenian birinz and the modern Persian biring.' (George Curtius, Greek Etymology, 5th edn., 1879; loc. cit. R. Swaminatha Aiyar, Dravidian Theories, 1922-23, repr., Delhi, Motilal Banarsidass, 1987, p.105). wrijzey, wrijey rice; wrijza'h a grain of rice (Psht. < Old Persian)(Skeat, Etymological Dictionary of the English Language). 'In spite of the temptation to derive the Arabic alruzz, aruzz, uruzz, wiz etc., from the Tamil arici modern philologists are agreed that they cannot be so derived, but come from the Old Persian word virinzi or virinza, the modern equivalent of which is biring. Sir C.J.Lyall states that virinza is exactly the equivalent we should expect of the Sanskrit word for "rice" vri_hi, and the names point to the time when the two branches of the Aryan race dwelt together and developed the respective peculiarities of their language from a common or original tongue. The Persians did not borrow the cultivation of rice from the Indians; the plant existed in the regions where the two races dwelt together before their respective migrations.' Watt, G., A Dictionary of Economic Products of India, 6 vols., Calcutta, 1889-1893). ari rice, husked grain (Ta.Ma.); akke (Ka.); aoi, akki (Tu.); ikki (Kod..); biyyamu (Te.). vari, pl. vad.lu unhusked paddy (Te.); wi_ (Si.); vari wild, uncultivated paddy (Ta.Ma.); navara a variety of quick-growing paddy (Ma.); sapi_d vari white rice (Old Persian); vraiheya place for vri_hi or connected with vri_hi (Nighan.t.u); vai paddy stalks (Ta.) ni_va_ra (Vedic); neji paddy (Tu.)
